WELSH-ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

E, A prefix in composition. It implies aptness to act, or to move.

E, standing alone, as a word, implies action going on, and when it accompanies a verb it is the agent performing the action described without the discrimination of a person. The pronoun it; but the particular character is generally marked by the context; except in the Silurian Dialect, where it implies he, and his. It is appropriately the sign of the active participle, making actions of the present tense, which without it would be otherwise. It has also the form, in many expressions, of what would be termed an adverb. Examples, gwelir, there will be seen; e welir, seeing takes place, or, it is seen; e'm gwelir, the seeing of me takes place, or, I am seen; e dyngai, the agent swearing was, or he (she, or it) swore; e dyngai y dyn, the man swore, nag e, not it, or it not.

serving their patronymic name, were often called after names characteristic of the countries they inhabited; the two most universal of which being the open plains and the woods; hence originated the two grand distinctions of Gal and Celt, or the open plain and the covert, with others of similar import. Of the same meaning with Gal and its derivatives are Gwal, Prydain, Peithyw, Gwynedd, Gwent, and Syllwg, fair or clear regions. With Ceiltiaid, may be classed the Gwyddyl or Gwyddelod; the Ysgotiaid, or Ysgodogion, and Celyddon,—the people of the coverts; of whom it is remarkable to observe, that not one became so powerful and stationary as to confer its name on the country. These two classes subsisted by different means, the result of which must of necessity have been a state of warfare; hence with the Celt the appellation of Gal came to be synonymous with Enemy; for as the Gal or cleared region, became too fully peopled, it sent out colonies in search of other settlements, to occupy which war must frequently have been the consequence maen glain, or maen magl, snake stones, adder stones, or adder beads. The main glain, transparent stones, or adder stones, were worn by the different orders of bards, each having its appropriate colour; the blue ones belonged to the presiding bards, the white to the druids, the green to the ovates, and the three colours blended, to the disciples. There is no certainty that they were worn from superstition originally; perhaps that was the circumstance which gave rise to it. Whatever might have been the cause, the notion of their rare virtues was universal in all places where the bardic religion was taught.—It may still be questioned whether they are the production of nature or art. Be that as it may, they are always to be found in great numbers; and there are people who may be aptly called hunters, from whom they are to be had; but they insist on being credited, that the Gleiniau are only to be had at one season of the year; and that they are blown by a knot of snakes. Ai chwythu y glain y maent? what, are they blowing the gem? (applied to people laying their heads together in conversation.)

Gwyddel, s. m.—pl. t. od (gwydd) That is of the woods, that is in a sylvan state; a savage. It is an appellative, synonymous with Celt, and Ysgotiad, for an individual of such tribes as lead a venatic life in woods, in contradistinction to the Gâl, living by cultivating the ground. Whichever of these two primary classes of mankind had the ascendency gave its name to the whole country: Hence Gwyddel is the general term in Welsh for a native of Ireland, because the tribes, of which the name is descriptive, appeared predominant to those who imposed it. There is a tradition of Wales's being once inhabited by the Gwythelians; or, more properly, its first inhabitants were so called; and the common people in speaking of it, ascribe some ruins about the country, under the name of Cytiau y Gwyddelod, to them; and the foxes are said to have been their dogs; and the polecats their domestic cats, and the like.

Gwyddelaidd, a. (gwyddel) Gwythelian-like.

Gwyddfoch, s. pl. (gwydd—moch) Wild swine.

> Aml yw'ch feirdd yw fudd;
> Emys llys nyw lludd;
> Emys rhydd rhuthr gwyddfoch.

Frequent to you bards his bounty; courtly steeds he does not withhold; bay steeds also with the wild boars' onset. Cynddelw, i O. Cyfeiliawg.

Gwyddfochyn, s. m. (gwyddfoch) A wild boar.

Gwyddgi, s. m. (gwydd—ci) A wild dog.

> Gwyddfid Eingl y'nghladd a'i trychai;
> Gwyddgwn coed, colled a'u porthai;
> Gwyddwal dyfnaual dyfuasai fy modd,
> Fy meddiant a gaffäai!

The Angles feeble as the woodbine, he that was wont to cut them is in the grave; the wild dogs of the wood, he that was wont to feed them is lost; he that had been laid in the wooden bed, he had made my mind tractable to himself, my all was at his disposal! Cynddelw, m. O. Gwynedd.

Gwyddgrug, s. m. (gwydd—crug) A mound of presence; a monumental mound, a tumulus.

Ar llary llaw hyged gweled gwyddlen,
Gwyddlen a'l gortho, gorthaw dristlawn;
Gwyddlan a'l gwerchyr, gorchudd gwythlawn!

My mind is not happy in the country of Cynghen, upon the mild one of liberal hand to see a veil of wood; a veil of wood does cover him, mournful the covering; a woody plain secludes him, a wrathful skreen. Cynddelw, m. Riryd.

Gwyddlwdn, s. m.—pl. gwyddlydnod (gwydd—llwdn) A wild beast.

HU, s. m. r. That is apt to pervade, or to spread over. An epithet of the Deity, in the bardic theology, descriptive of his omniscience. Huon is another appellation of the same import, and derived from Hu. The hound, on account of his acute scent, was adopted as the common emblem of this attribute, and which, if we may rely upon the accounts of some authors, became an object of idolatrous worship; for he is unquestionably identified in the Heus of Gaul, and the Anubis of Egypt.

Dwy ryw awen, dloer, ewybr,
Y sy'n y byd, loewbryd lwybr;
Awen gan Grist, ddidrist ddadl,
O iawn dro, awen drwyadl;
Awen arall, nid call cant,
Ar gelwydd, fudr argoeliant,
Yr hon a gafas, gwyr HU,
Camrwysg prydyddion Cymru.

Truly two sorts of active geniuses are there in the world, of manifest path; a genius from Christ, pleasing the assertion; of right tendency a sprightly genius; another genius, though not discreet the song, there is of falsehood, base the symptom, the which, HU knows, the disorderly poets of Wales obtained. Dr. S. Cent.

HU gadarn, por hoew geidwawd,
Brenin a roe'r gwin, a'r gwawd,
Emherawdr tir a moroedd,
A bywyd oll o'r byd oedd;
Ai daliodd, gwedy diliw,
Aradr brainsg, arnodd-gadr, gwiw;
Er dangaws, ein ior dawngoeth,
I'r dyn balch, a'r difalch doeth,
Bod yn oreu, nid gau gair,
Un-grefft gan y tad iawn-grair.

The mighty HU is a sovereign who is a ready protector, a king distributing the wine, and the praise; the emperor of the land and seas, and all of life in the world was he; after the deluge he held the strong-beamed plough, active and excellent; this did our gracious Lord, to shew to man, the proud and the humbly wise, that it was the choicest art with the faithful father; the word is not false. Iolo Goch.

Ychain—
HU gadarn, a darn o'i did,
A'i bum angel a welwch,
A pheirian aur ffamdan ffwch.

They are the oxen of the mighty HU, with a piece of his chain, and his five angels, you see, and a golden harness of active fiery flame. Llywelyn Moel, i'r meili.
